KENYA : Tackling food security through exports

Kenya is a major exporter of fresh fruit and vegetables, and "Action Against Hunger" have demonstrated that producing for export also has a very positive impact on the production of food for local consumption. Export horticulture is increasingly recognized as a vehicle that can improve food security by promoting and enabling the adoption of good practice. This transfer of know-how forms an essential element of the COLEACP strategy to maximize the impact of export horticulture on poverty alleviation.

If you are travelling with Brussels Airlines this month you will have an opportunity to watch the COLEACP film "Exports are good for local communities". Brussels Airlines has joined with us to demonstrate their support for Kenyan growers, notably the many small-scale farmers involved in the production of peas and beans for export.
